Today's featured story follows an industry that allows private lawyers to partner with elected attorneys general and temporarily gain powers usually reserved for the government.

Under the banner of their state partners, these lawyers sue corporations and help set public policy while collecting millions of dollars in fees.

A case against Centene, one of the nation's largest insurance companies, is just one example in a thriving industry that allows private attorneys to partner with elected attorneys general and temporarily gain powers usually reserved for the government.

Today's featured story follows an industry that allows private lawyers to partner with elected attorneys general and temporarily gain powers usually reserved for the government.

Under the banner of their state partners, these lawyers sue corporations and help set public policy while collecting millions of dollars in fees.

A case against Centene, one of the nation's largest insurance companies, is just one example in a thriving industry that allows private lawyers to partner with elected attorneys general and temporarily gain powers usually reserved for the government.

Under the banner of their state partners, these lawyers sue corporations and help set public policy while collecting millions of dollars in fees.

A case against Centene, one of the nation's largest insurance companies, is just one example in a thriving industry that allows private lawyers to partner with elected attorneys general and temporarily gain powers usually reserved for the government.

Under the banner of their state partners, these lawyers sue corporations and help set public policy while collecting millions of dollars in fees.

A case against Centene, one of the nation's largest insurance companies, is just one example in a thriving industry that allows private lawyers to partner with elected attorneys general and temporarily gain powers usually reserved for the government.

Under the banner of their state partners, these lawyers sue corporations and help set public policy while collecting millions of dollars in fees.

A case against Centene, one of the nation's largest insurance companies, is just one example in a thriving industry that allows private lawyers to partner with elected attorneys general and temporarily gain powers usually reserved for the government.

Under the banner of their state partners, these lawyers sue corporations and help set public policy while collecting millions of dollars in fees.

A case against Centene, one of the nation's largest insurance companies, is just one example in a thriving industry that allows private lawyers to partner with elected attorneys general and temporarily gain powers usually reserved for the government.

Under the banner of their state partners, these lawyers sue corporations and help set public policy while collecting millions of dollars in fees.

A case against Centene, one of the nation's largest insurance companies, is just one example in a thriving industry that allows private lawyers to partner with elected attorneys general and temporarily gain powers usually reserved for the government.

Under the banner of their state partners, these lawyers sue corporations and help set public policy while collecting millions of dollars in fees.

A case against Centene, one of the nation's largest insurance companies, is just one example in a thriving industry that allows private lawyers to partner with elected attorneys general and temporarily gain powers usually reserved for the government.

Under the banner of their state partners, these lawyers sue corporations and help set public policy while collecting millions of dollars in fees.